'Why won't they let the dead rest?' Mail on Sunday reveals 999 operators are ordering the public to resuscitate the dead bodies of loved ones who can't be saved for fear of 'getting in trouble'

- Call staff routinely ordering grieving relatives to perform CPR on dead bodies
- Families being 'guilt tripped' by handlers who say they'll get into trouble
- Doctors now demanding urgent overhaul of 999 services following MoS exposé

Emergency call handlers are routinely issuing 'grotesque' instructions ordering callers to attempt to resuscitate the bodies of loved ones who are obviously beyond help, The Mail on Sunday can reveal. In horrific accounts given to this newspaper, readers have told how they were commanded to perform futile chest compressions on corpses already blackened with decomposition, stiff with rigor mortis or badly damaged.

Some told how operators 'shouted' at them, despite protestations that a parent, spouse or other family member had 'been dead for hours'.

Others were told they would 'get into trouble' if they did not comply with instructions, and they spoke of how they were made to feel 'guilty' for not doing enough if they objected to carrying out CPR attempts.

But one 999 insider admitted they felt they had no option but to follow the protocols to avoid legal cases against them for 'lack of duty of care'.

The revelations last night led senior medics to call for an urgent overhaul of emergency call rules, saying they 'lacked common sense' and were inhumane.

The issue was highlighted in May when our resident GP, Dr Ellie Cannon, mentioned in her monthly column one such incident she had been told of. She was inundated with emails and letters revealing similarly traumatic stories.

One typical experience was recounted by Susan Laverick, 59, from Ramsgate, Kent, who wrote: 'I went in to give Mum her pills with her morning cup of tea and found her lying face down on the floor. She was cold to the touch and it was obvious that she had passed away.

'She lived with us, but I hadn't heard anything. I think she must have died during the previous night.'

Her mother Doris was 83. She had worsening dementia, diabetes and a heart condition when she died in November 2015. Susan said: 'I immediately phoned 999 and after asking me if Mum felt warm - she wasn't - the operator insisted I turn her over. Mum was quite a large lady, so this was a struggle to do. It also gave me a shock seeing her face as she had obviously broken her nose in the fall and her face was covered in blood.

'Horrendous': Susan Laverick was asked to try to revive her mother Doris, pictured above, after her parent had suffered a massive heart attack

'I told the operator that her chest was still slightly warm and I said obviously it would be, as she had been lying on it.

'But I was instructed to start chest compressions. I said her body was cold and it was obvious she had died but the operator started counting and told me to count with her and that I had to do the compressions at the same time.

'The noise coming out of Mum's chest was horrendous – horrible gasps. I stopped. I just thought I shouldn't be doing this to my mother. I kept saying "She's gone, I know she's gone", but the operator was really insistent.

'She just kept saying, "You are pumping her chest, aren't you? You must keep doing it to help her." I just pretended I was carrying on.

'The ambulance men arrived within three or four minutes. I passed the phone to them and they took over, but after a couple of minutes they said there was no point.

'I just sat on the floor and sobbed.

Afterwards when I thought about what had been done, I realised how shocking the whole thing was. A post mortem showed she had died instantly of a massive heart attack and wouldn't have known anything, but it has stayed with me. It was not what should have happened.'

"The operator insisted I turn her over. Mum was quite a large lady, so this was a struggle to do. It also gave me a shock seeing her face as she had obviously broken her nose in the fall and her face was covered in blood"

Susan is not alone in dealing with a system that appears to ignore common sense.

Other readers said they were threatened and told they would 'be in trouble' if they did not comply with instructions to perform CPR. Many have been left with painful memories of hauling corpses into different positions.

One reader, who asked not to be identified, spoke of her ordeal when her husband died. The 83-year-old from Guildford, Surrey, said: 'He had passed away peacefully in his chair. But I was ordered to get him on to the floor and told to do CPR.

'It has left us with quite dreadful memories of his last moments – the pounding of a lifeless body.'

Another, named Janet, had a gruesome experience on finding an elderly neighbour's body. 'As soon as I stepped into her flat I knew she had passed away. I phoned 999 but didn't know which service to ask for.

'I told the operator my neighbour had been dead a while – she had turned black – and the operator asked more than once if I would be prepared to do CPR.

'I begged her not to make me do it, and waited outside until the emergency services arrived.'

A 999 call handler who contacted The Mail on Sunday anonymously explained that they had no choice but to give these instructions, saying: 'We can be sued if protocol is not followed. Some health trusts may insist that operators persist with CPR instructions to avoid any claims of lack of duty of care.'

But Dr Gordon Cauldwell, a consultant physician from Worthing, West Sussex, said: 'What is happening now is quite grotesque and should be stopped.'

Cardiopulmonary resuscitation, or CPR, can be life-saving if given within minutes of a heart stopping, keeping someone alive until the emergency medical services arrive. The most important elements are chest compressions to

According to CitizensAdvice, when someone dies at home their GP should be called as soon as possible. If the death was expected, they should be able to visit and issue a certificate giving the cause.

mechanically pump blood around the body and rescue breaths – the ‘kiss of life’ – to provide oxygen.

Dr Cauldwell said: ‘In ordinary dying, particularly in old age, or after long illness, all the vital organs fail and the heart is the last vital organ to stop. In those circumstances [CPR] cannot restore life.’

Emergency call handlers will advise a caller to start CPR if they discover a person who is not breathing, and has no pulse.

Training instructions for 999 operators, which are produced by NHS Pathways, also give four ‘common signs’ of irreversible death – where CPR will not help: rigor mortis, obvious swelling or decomposition in a body dead for some time, or bodily damage, including decapitation. But the documents, which were obtained by The Mail on Sunday after a Freedom of Information request, advise handlers not to ask people to confirm signs of death, such as the pooling of non-circulating blood under the body, which causes skin to discolour.

The guidance for 999 call handlers advises: ‘... [give] resuscitation advice to anyone where death is not expected, no terminal illness is identified... and there is not a discovery of a corpse or stone-cold body.’

However, a ‘stone-cold body’ is defined in the guidelines only as one where there is evidence of death from drowning or violence.

The assumption, therefore, is that everyone else should be given CPR – although elsewhere the documents warn that chances of survival after the heart has stopped decline by ten per cent for each minute CPR is delayed, meaning that death is certain after ten minutes.

Rowan Harwood, Professor of Geriatrics and End of Life Care at Nottingham University, said: ‘We seem to have lost all sense of proportion and almost all common sense. You can’t blame the call handlers for doing what they’re told but I think there’s a very good case for saying these procedures need to be re-examined and revised.’

‘The chance of CPR working in a frail elderly person who has collapsed at home is virtually zero.’

And Ken Spearpoint, an emeritus specialist consultant resuscitation nurse at Imperial College London, said: ‘We need to discuss a more commonsense, decent and humane way of dealing with this.’

However, a spokesman for the Association of Ambulance Chief Executives (AACE) said: ‘In almost all cases, advice to start bystander basic life support/CPR is

If you can’t get hold of the person’s GP, then Citizens Advice say call 111, which is the number for help when it’s not an emergency.

It’s important to note that one in five calls to 111 are currently referred to the ambulance service or A&E anyway, meaning if there was any ambiguity (as a non-medical professional, I’d not be totally confident in confirming someone dead – would you?), you’d probably end up being directed to 999 operators.

None of this helps the scores of readers who dialled 999 and ended up being ordered to carry out CPR on the corpse of a relative or friend.

The big question is why, when told clearly by the caller that the person they had found was beyond help, there was no protocol in place that would have saved them from such a traumatic experience.

The organisations responsible for coming up with emergency-care guidance and training need to face up to that, and take steps to better support the public in such difficult circumstances.

appropriate and may give a person who appears to be lifeless a chance of survival, until an ambulance arrives... as recommended by the Resuscitation Council which publishes guidance on effective CPR.

'The action of dialling 999 is a request for emergency assistance to preserve life.

'If a member of the public is seeking help to report that someone has died, then the appropriate route of contact would be calling NHS 111.'

A Resuscitation Council spokesman said: 'The best chance of survival after cardiac arrest is when CPR is started as soon as possible – and it will be of no benefit and an undignified intrusion for those whose death was expected and irreversible.

'Members of the public may not be able to distinguish between sudden cardiac arrest and irreversible death.

'The actions of 999 call handlers [are] outside the role and responsibility of the Resuscitation Council, and NHS Pathways develop the scripts used by 999 and 111 call handlers.'

NHS Digital, which is responsible for NHS Pathways, the best-practice guidelines for emergency services, said: 'Our content supports six of the 11 ambulance services in England and currently reflects the national guidance on resuscitation advice.'

Last night, veteran MP Sir Peter Bottomley demanded that Health Secretary Jeremy Hunt conduct an urgent review of training for 999 operators.

He said: 'What is happening is wrong. Elderly people should be allowed a natural death.'

'I DID 15 MINUTES CPR ON MY DEAD HUSBAND... THAT TRAUMATISED ME MORE THAN HIM DYING'

More than 100 Mail on Sunday readers wrote to us, reliving the trauma of being forced to perform CPR on relatives or friends who were beyond help. Here are extracts from just a few of them. They make shocking reading, but their stories must be told...

'Our mother was 100 when she died. She knew she was going, called my sister and managed to hang on until she arrived, and then passed away.

'My sister rang for an ambulance and the operator shouted at her to get Mum off the bed on to the floor and give her CPR – despite my sister saying she was definitely dead.

'The operator said that she'd be in trouble if she didn't do as she was told.

'We would have made a complaint, but my sister just wanted to put the whole incident behind her. Mum did not have a peaceful death because of the insensitivity of that operator.' - Nola

'Three years ago my husband died at home, in front of me, of terminal lung cancer. I rang 999 and was told to do CPR until the paramedics arrived. I said it was pointless but all I got was, "You must do it." So I spent 15 minutes doing CPR on my obviously dead husband. I was more traumatised by that than I was by his death, which was expected.' - Beth home. I was utterly shocked and distraught to find him collapsed and knew immediately he was beyond help.

'I called my wife, who arrived with our eldest son. He called 999 as we weren't sure of the protocol.

'He was told several times to lay Dad on the floor and apply chest compressions. It wasn't until my wife took the phone and became extremely forceful that they stopped. The trauma of that first telephone call still upsets me.' - Alan

'We found our friend who was very unwell with Parkinson's in bed. We tried to get a response but none came and she had no pulse. I rang 999 and was instructed to go back upstairs and to perform CPR and then the Heimlich manoeuvre, in case there was something in the airway. Although this was very distressing, we carried on.

'The operator continued to instruct us until the paramedics arrived. They immediately told us that she had died some time before as the blood had pooled under the skin where she lay. We felt that somehow we had violated our friend in her peace.' - Joyce

'I am a retired registered nurse with more than 50 years of nursing experience, and know the difference between sudden, unexpected death when CPR helps and a normal end of life after illness.

'I was present when a neighbour died in his conservatory looking out over his garden after a long illness. I called 999 and was asked to perform CPR. When I refused, the operator asked for my registration number and I gave her short shrift to that.' - Patricia

'My father-in-law was 89 and suffered kidney failure, heart failure and other health issues. My sister-in-law went to pick him up to take him to dialysis and found him face down on the kitchen floor, dead.

'She called 999 and told the operator he was definitely dead but they insisted she do CPR.

'He was a frail man and she heard his ribs break while she was doing it. When the paramedics came, they said he'd been dead for 18 hours or so.' - Christine

Call handlers would never tell people to attempt to resuscitate a dead person - the callers have obviously not made it totally clear that the person in question was already deceased or had been for some time. It will be the responsibility of the call handler to try to save lives, and that will involve CPR in some cases until the paramedics turn up. This is a dreadful article that fails to acknowledge the fantastic work that our emergency services do 24 hours a day, 365 days a year.

if someone wasn't dead why would they need resuscitating? So of course CPR is performed on dead people and as nurse I've done it on many dead people !!? And as the story says the call handlers are ordering people to do CPR on people long dead for fear of being in trouble if they dont!

Why are you calling for an ambulance for someone that is obviously deceased? If you call an ambulance for someone it is fair to assume it's because you think they can be saved. If you're sure, call their GP. Don't daily mail this shit up. Those people have a hard enough job as it is without you lambasting them for doing it.

My friend had to break in her father in laws house and found him dead. They told her to perform CPR and she told them he was blue and been dead for hours but she still had to and told me later how horrible it was cos she moved his head and it just stayed there. Common sense has to be applied.

I saw my husband die and the second he died it was perfectly clear he was 100% dead. I rang my GP first and was told that as she had not seen him recently I HAD to ring 999 in order to get a death certificate. My husband was suffering widespread advanced cancer including in the spine, lungs, kidney, liver and the entire pelvis and in constant agony. I confess I waited 15 minutes before ringing and spent that time lying beside him, I am so thankful he died so peacefully, comfortably and awake and looking at me whilst we held onto each other. The ambulance medics were respectful and gentle and also didn't even attempt CPR.

Then if you're worried they've been murdered why are you speaking to the AMBULANCE? If they're expected to die like most people who die (e.g. from cancer etc) then you ring 99 then you are a muppet of the highest accord. IF you find someone unexpectedly dead and you DONT do CPR and accuse them of bullying you then you are a muppet maybe of even higher accord - in hospital we will always do CPR even if the person is cold unless they have a DNACPR.

The sensible thing to do if you found someone who is dead and you're not willing to do CPR because it's 'pointless' like most of these people suggest it is, is to ring your GP (in day) as they are the ones who will confirm death and refer to coroner's court if there is anything suspicious e.g. suspicion of murder. There is your answer Helga.
